Hello everyone,

My name is Matthias Fellon, I am 24 years old, and today I am going to talk to you about a topic that was introduced to me early in my life: video games.

20 years ago, my father already had a computer that he used sometimes to play some video games, usually racing games (such as Need for Speed) or war games (such as Medal of Honor). Being too young to play war games, I was occasionally playing these racing games even if they were too difficult for me at the time.

A few years later, my parents gave me my first console, a Gameboy Color, and one of the first games that left a mark on my childhood was "Pokémon Vert Feuille". I spent hours playing it, starting new games, and capturing new Pokémon. From that moment, I absolutely wanted to play at every new Pokémon game release. I think I have never missed a single Pokémon game release since then.

Year after year, I get other game consoles like the Nintendo DS, PlayStation 2, and even the Wii. Each of these consoles introduced me to other franchises that also left a mark on me, such as Mario, Sonic, FIFA, and many others...

Over the years, I managed to get other consoles like the Xbox 360 and the PS3, on which I discovered another game that had a huge impact on me, Minecraft.

Today, I don't really play on these consoles anymore because I was able to build my own computer, on which I discovered one of the latest games that has left a mark on my life, Rocket League.

Video games really rocked my childhood, and I still love playing them.
